Response to the Non-Criminal Barricade: Disengagement & Special Relationships[®]

Now Available Online or as an In-Person Course.

The way law enforcement officers respond to a mentally ill person in crisis is a topic of intense debate. If you are like a lot of law enforcement professionals you've considered these questions:

- ❓ What should officers do with a suicidal person alone in their own home who refuses to exit?
- ❓ Do officers have a legal duty to take action to try to save the subject from harming themselves?
- ❓ When is it appropriate to disengage from a non-criminal barricaded suspect and will officers be found liable if the subject harms a third party?

In this course, we'll first answer each of those questions and discuss the relevant laws about liability and the "special relationship" doctrine. Through dramatic body-worn camera footage of actual non-criminal barricades, we'll examine why some agencies were later found liable and some were not. You'll learn the modern tactics your agency can use to both limit liability and prevent a violent confrontation.

Each student will receive:

- ✔ A simple decision making cheat sheet to help guide your officers and supervisors when to engage, disengage and reengage.
- ✔ Access to our carefully curated collection of non-criminal barricade policies from progressive police agencies.
- ✔ How to use tactical conduct and practical de-escalation to avoid a violent confrontation.

This is tactically minded and legally sound de-escalation training for law enforcement.

This course is open to law enforcement officers and other public safety agency affiliated personnel.
